The comic Coraline, written by Neil Gaiman, was a great mind-capturing comic. In the story there was a family with a daughter, a dad, a mom and lastly a very unique cat. While the girl is exploring the mansion she shares with several other families she finds a door with a brick wall behind it. When she asked her mother about it, her mom told her that it used to be a passageway to another part of the house, an empty apartment now. A few days later Coraline, the daughter opens the door once again because she had heard sounds behind it and the brick wall was gone. When she goes to explore the empty apartment she experiences many things she never would have dreamed of.

This comic was something I have never read before, as it was very creative and the illustrations were just beyond amazing. The way this book was captured with a comic is just mind-blowing. Coraline was a great story and I would definitely recommend this comic to all of my friends who like to read. I may have finished this comic very quickly and kind of wish that it could have been drawn out to be longer, but it was very interesting and well-targeted to teens and middle school aged kids. If I have the chance, I will definitely read it again.
