Calgary's new south hospital opens doors

Out-patient clinic open, but emergency rooms won't be ready until next year

CBC News - Posted: Sep 06, 2012 3:47 PM MT | Last Updated: September 6, 2012

After years of planning, the first patients finally walked through the doors of Calgary's new acute care hospital Thursday.

Only out-patient clinics are operating right now at the South Health Campus, as the emergency room and other facilities aren't slated to open until next year.

The facility features extra wide hallways and the latest medical technology.

Currently, the province is still looking to fill many of the 2,600 staff positions.

"All the indications I have from [Alberta Health Services] is that they're on track," said Health Minister Fred Horne. "There's 1,000 people working here today, so I'm not concerned about the staffing at this point."

Calgary's newest hospital is open and ready for business.

The doors of the South Health Campus emergency department swung open for the first time to the public Monday morning, welcoming more than 160 staff to their first day serving the city at the new facility.

According to the Calgary Herald, several other units open today as well, including mental health emergency services, cardiac diagnostics and the bone and joint cast clinic.

The hope is that the new ER will help ease some of the burden felt at other hospitals dealing with a space crunch from a rash of people seeking treatment for the flu and Norovirus.

"I'm excited. To see this facility go from a farmer's field to a nine-storey, massive complex with an incredible amount of technology, who wouldn't be excited to work here. I certainly can't wait for the doors to open," Dr. Colin Del Castilho, physician site lead for the campus, told the Herald.
